A Dictionary of Medicine and the Allied Sciences: Comprising the Pronunciation, Derivation, and Full Explanation of Medical, Pharmaceutical, Dental, and Veterinary Terms (Classic Reprint) A. Duane

It has been the aim of the Author in the preparation of the successive editions of this book to give sufficient but succinct information concerning every word that the student or physician will be likely to meet with in the course of his professional reading. So ample, however, is the medical vocabulary of to-day that space for the insertion of all really useful terms has been secured only by the careful omission of obsolete words. Practical utility rather than historical tradition has controlled the selection of matter; hence the work differs from most of its contemporaries in omitting words which are nowadays found only in dictionaries. This has a double advantage, since it not only secures space for more useful material, but also greatly facilitates consultation. The space thus gained has been utilized by the insertion of much descriptive and explanatory matter under the more important headings which would be very inadequately represented by a mere definition, however full. Thus, under the principal diseases a sketch is given of their causation, symptoms and treatment; under the more important organs, an outline of their structure and functions; under each drug an account of its action and therapeutic uses, and of all the preparations of it official in the latest editions of the pharmacopoeias of the United States, Great Britain (Ed. of 1898), and Germany (supplementary edition). The important physiological functions and generic biological and chemical terms receive similar extended explanation. In arranging this descriptive matter in consecutive form, continuity and logical order have been kept in view, rather than strict alphabetical arrangement. The inclusion of this encyclopedic information constitutes a marked and, in the Author's belief, a very useful feature of the work. The present edition contains a vast amount of new material, representing the
